

RECON Online Working Paper 2011/12

Transnational Justice and Democracy

Rainer Forst

Rainer Forst Transnational justice and democracy

RECON Online Working Paper 2011/12 April 2011

URL: www.reconproject.eu/projectweb/portalproject/RECONWorkingPapers.html

© 2011 Rainer Forst RECON Online Working Paper Series | ISSN 1504-6907

Rainer Forst is Professor of Political Theory and Philosophy at Johann Wolfgang Goethe University, Frankfurt am Main. E-mail: forst@em.uni-frankfurt.de.

This paper was translated by Ciaran Cronin.

The RECON Online Working Paper Series publishes pre-print manuscripts on democracy and the democratisation of the political order Europe. The series is interdisciplinary in character, but is especially aimed at political science, political theory, sociology, and law. It publishes work of theoretical, conceptual as well as of empirical character, and it also encourages submissions of policy-relevant analyses, including specific policy recommendations. The series' focus is on the study of democracy within the multilevel configuration that makes up the European Union.

Papers are available in electronic format only and can be downloaded in pdf-format at www.reconproject.eu. Go to Publications | RECON Working Papers.

Issued by ARENA Centre for European Studies University of Oslo P.O.Box 1143 Blindern | 0318 Oslo | Norway Tel: +47 22 85 87 00 | Fax +47 22 85 87 10 www.arena.uio.no

Abstract

This paper argues against three traditional dogmas in political theory: the thesis of the (conceptual and practical) incompatibility between democracy and justice; the idea that a "context of justice" only exists within the confines of a state; and the view that political democracy presupposes a demos organised within a state. Only if these dogmas are overcome can a proper conception of transnational justice and democracy be worked out. The key to this is the right "picture" of justice as based on a principle of discursive justification.

Keywords

Democracy — Democratisation — Discourse — Justice — Normative Political Theory — Political Science — Supranationalism — Transnational Justice

Three Dogmas of Political Theory

The title I have chosen seems to signal a tension, even a contradiction, in a number of respects. Democracy appears to be a form of political organisation and government in which, through general and public participatory procedures, a sufficiently legitimate political will is formed which acquires the force of law. Justice, by contrast, appears to be a value external to this context which is not so much linked to procedures of "input" or "throughput" legitimation but is understood instead as an output- or outcome-oriented concept.² At times, justice is even understood as an otherworldly idea which, when transported into the Platonic cave, merely causes trouble and ends up as an undemocratic elite project.³ In methodological terms, too, this difference is sometimes signalled in terms of a contrast between a form of "worldly" political thought and "abstract" and otherworldly philosophical reflection on justice.⁴

In my view, we are bound to talk past the issues to be discussed under the heading "transnational justice and democracy" unless we first root out false dichotomies such as the ones mentioned. My thesis will be that justice must be "secularised" or "grounded" both with regard to how we understand it and to its application to relations beyond the state. This thesis clashes with certain erroneous dogmas in political theory, to begin with:

1. The dogma of the essential difference between democracy and justice and their potential political incompatibility.

Overcoming this assumption in order to develop a theory of transnational justice and democracy is only one step in the argument. For such a theory also makes it necessary to question two further premises which restrict the scope of both justice and democracy, namely:

2. The dogma that the necessary preconditions of a "context of justice" can be satisfied only within the confines of a state and;

3. The dogma that democracy must take the form of a practice of a demos organised within a state.

I will begin with a discussion of the first dogma.

¹ I presented earlier versions of this paper at the General Conference of the German Association of Political Science in Kiel in September 2009, at the Final Conference of the Research Project on "Transnational Justice and Democracy" of the Frankfurt Cluster of Excellence "The Formation of Normative Orders" in Bad Homburg in September 2010, at the RECON Workshop on "The European Political Order: State-less but Democratic and Just?" in Oslo in September/October 2010, at the Annual Meeting of the Eastern Division of the American Philosophical Association in Boston in December 2010, in the Political Theory Colloquium in Frankfurt in January 2011 and in the Colloquium in Legal and Social Philosophy at University College London in February 2011. I owe special thanks to the collaborators in these research projects and to the commentators on this paper, in particular to Jürgen Neyer, Klaus Schlichte, Nicole Deitelhoff, Peter Niesen, Klaus Dieter Wolf, Ayelet Banai, Rainer Schmalz-Bruns, Erik O. Eriksen, John Erik Fossum, Kjartan Koch Mikalsen, Daniel Gaus, Ken Baynes, Seyla Benhabib, Stefan Gosepath, Julian Culp, Franziska Dübgen, Christian Volk, Dorothea Gädeke, Enrico Zoffoli, George Letsas and John Tasioulas.

² For example, see Jürgen Neyer, "Justice, not democracy," in: Rainer Forst and Rainer Schmalz-Bruns (eds), Political Legitimacy and Democracy in Transnational Perspective, RECON Report 13, Oslo: ARENA, 2011; and my reply in the same volume: "Justice and democracy: Comment on Jürgen Neyer."

³ Ingeborg Maus, "Der Urzustand," in Otfried Höffe (ed.), John Rawls. Eine Theorie der Gerechtigkeit (Berlin: Akademie, 1998); Harald Müller, Wie kann eine neue Weltordnung aussehen? (Frankfurt/Main: Fischer, 2008).

⁴ Michael Walzer, Interpretation and Social Criticism (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard, 1987).

Two Pictures of Justice

Let me begin with a brief reference to Wittgenstein. In the Philosophical Investigations, he writes: "A picture held us captive. And we could not get outside it, for it lay in our language and language seemed to repeat it to us inexorably."⁵ I believe that reflection on justice is all too often held captive by a specific, unpolitical picture which rests on a particular interpretation of the ancient principle "To each his own" (suum cuique). This principle, which has been central to our understanding of justice since Plato, is interpreted in such a way that the primary issue is what goods individuals receive or deserve as a matter of justice – in other words, the primary issue is who "gets" what. The search for answers leads either to comparisons between the collections of goods people possess and points to relative conclusions; or one asks whether individuals have "enough" of the goods which are vital for leading a good life or one befitting a human being, irrespective of comparisons. Granted, these goods- and distributioncentred, recipient-oriented points of view have their point, for distributive justice is, of course, a matter of allocating goods; nevertheless this picture conceals essential aspects of justice – in the first place, the question of how the goods to be distributed come "into the world," thus questions of production and its just organization. Furthermore, secondly, this picture ignores the political question of who determines the structures of production and distribution and how, as though there could be a huge distribution machine that only needed to be programmed correctly.⁶ But not only would such a machine be problematic, because it would mean that justice would no longer be understood as an accomplishment of the subjects themselves but would turn them instead into passive recipients; this idea also neglects, thirdly, the insight that justified claims to goods do not simply "exist" but can only be ascertained discursively through corresponding justification procedures in which - and this is the fundamental requirement of justice – all are involved as free and equal individuals.

Finally, in the fourth place, the goods-fixated view of justice also largely ignores the question of injustice; for, by concentrating on overcoming deficiencies of goods, it treats someone who is deprived of goods and resources as a result of a natural catastrophe as equivalent to someone who experiences the same deprivation as a result of economic or political exploitation. It is true that assistance is appropriate in both cases. However, as I understand the grammar of justice, in the one case it is required as an act of moral solidarity, but in the other as an act of justice conditioned by the nature of one's involvement in relations of exploitation and injustice⁷ and the specific wrong in question. Ignoring this difference can lead one to mistake what is actually a requirement of justice for an act of generous "aid."⁸

⁵ Ludwig Wittgenstein, Philosophical Investigations, trans. G. E. M. Anscombe (Oxford: Blackwell, 1978), p. 48e (§ 115).

⁶ For the first two points, see especially Iris Young, Justice and the Politics of Difference (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1990), and my "Radical Justice: On Iris Marion Young's Critique of the 'Distributive Paradigm'," Constellations 14, 2007, pp. 260-65.

⁷ Here a whole series of cases would have to be distinguished: direct participation in or (joint) causation of injustice; indirect participation in injustice by profiting from it, without oneself actively contributing to relations of exploitation; and the ("natural") duty to put an end to unjust relations, even if one does not profit from them but possesses the means to overcome them.

⁸ See my "A Dialectic of Morality," in Andreas Føllesdal and Thomas Pogge (eds), Real World Justice (Dordrecht: Springer, 2005), pp. 27-36.

For the reasons cited, it is necessary, especially when dealing with questions of distributive justice, to recognize the political point of justice and to liberate oneself from a false and reified picture which is focused solely on quantities of goods. On the contrary, if we follow a second, more appropriate picture, justice should aim at intersubjective relations and structures, not at subjective or supposedly objective states of the provision of goods. Only by thus taking into consideration the first question of justice – namely, the justifiability of social relations and, correspondingly, of how much "justificatory power" individuals or groups have in a political context – does a radical, critical conception of justice become possible, one which gets at the roots of relations of injustice.

The Right to Justification

Here we must first ask what justifies us in speaking of a "false" as opposed to a more "appropriate" picture of justice; for after all, the goods- or recipient-centred understanding can appeal to the time-honoured principle suum cuique. Is there a more original, deeper meaning of justice than this? In my opinion there is. The concept of justice possesses a core meaning to which the essential contrasting concept is that of arbitrariness,⁹ understood in a social sense, whether it assumes the form of arbitrary rule by individuals or by part of the community (for example, a class) over others, or of the acceptance of social contingencies which lead to asymmetrical positions or relations of domination and are defended and accepted as an unalterable fate, even though they are nothing of the sort. Arbitrary rule is the rule of some people over others without legitimate reason, i.e., domination, and where struggles are conducted against injustice they are first and foremost directed against forms of domination of this kind. The underlying impulse that opposes injustice is not primarily that of wanting something, or more of something, but of not wanting to be dominated, harassed or overruled any longer in one's claim and basic right to justification. This claim involves the demand that no political or social relations should exist which cannot be adequately justified towards those involved. Herein resides the profoundly political essence of justice which the principle suum cuique not only fails to grasp but tends to conceal; for justice is a matter of who determines who receives what - thus the dimension which in Plato is represented by the idea of the Good or by the philosopher king. In my picture, the demand for justice is an emancipatory one; reflexively speaking, it rests on the claim to be respected as a subject of justification, that is, to be respected in one's dignity as a being who can provide and demand justifications. The person who lacks certain goods should not be regarded as the primary victim of injustice but the one who does not "count" in the production and allocation of goods.

⁹ See also Rawls's definition in A Theory of Justice, rev. ed. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999), p. 5. For a discussion of arbitrariness and a critique of Philip Pettit's important view in his Republicanism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), see Henry Richardson, Democratic Autonomy (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002), ch. 3. I cannot go into this here, but I prefer to explain arbitrariness by way of an account of justification rather than liberty, mainly because only by having recourse to certain criteria of justification can one explain which encroachments on liberty are justifiable and which are not.

Egalitarian Theories

One can cut different paths through contemporary discussions on justice. However the one opened up by the question of the two pictures of justice is especially instructive, for from this perspective certain adversaries unexpectedly find themselves in the same boat.

An example is provided by the recent debate concerning equality. By this is actually meant two points of discussion: on the one hand, the question "Equality of what?" – of resources, welfare, or capabilities¹⁰ – and, on the other, the question "Why equality at all?" From the perspective of the difference between the two pictures of justice, however, it becomes apparent that both the advocates and the opponents of equality frequently operate with the same understanding, and this often even finds expression in a specific image, that of the goddess Justitia as a mother who has to divide up a cake and asks herself how this should be done.¹¹ Egalitarians argue for the primacy of the equal distribution of goods, according to which other arguments for legitimate unequal distributions – for instance, ones based on need, merit or prior claims – then have to be treated as special reasons. Alternatively, an egalitarian calculus of need satisfaction – welfare – is posited which serves as the goal of distribution.¹² However in the process the question of how the cake was produced and, even more important, who gets to play the role of the mother remains largely unthematized. Yet that is the principal question of justice.

Critics of Equality

Analogous problems are found on the side of the critics of equality. In Harry Frankfurt's view, for example, the defenders of egalitarian conceptions of justice cannot be concerned with the value of equality at all; for if you ask them what is so bad about inequality, they respond by pointing to the negative consequences of living conditions in a society of inequality, in particular to the fact that certain people lack important goods for a satisfactory life.¹³

So-called "sufficientarians"¹⁴ have taken up these arguments and argue that "at least the especially important, elementary standards of justice are of a nonrelational

¹⁰ See, especially, Gerald Cohen, "Equality of What? On Welfare, Goods, and Capabilities," in Martha Nussbaum und Amartya Sen (eds.), The Quality of Life (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993), pp. 9-29.

¹¹ See, for example, Ernst Tugendhat, Vorlesungen über Ethik (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 1993), pp. 373f.; Wilfried Hinsch, Gerechtfertigte Ungleichheiten (Berlin: de Gruyter, 2002), p. 169f.; Stefan Gosepath, Gleiche Gerechtigkeit (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 2004), p. 250ff. The cake example, though without the mother, can also be found in Isaiah Berlin, "Equality", in Concepts and Categories, H. Hardy (ed.) (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1981), p. 84.

¹² This is especially true of "luck egalitarianism." For a paradigmatic expression, see Richard Arneson, "Luck Egalitarianism: An Interpretation and Defense," Philosophical Topics 32 (2004): 1-20 and "Luck and Equality," Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society, suppl. vol. (2001), 73-90. For a critique see Elisabeth Anderson, "What is the Point of Equality?" Ethics 109 (1999): 287-337.

¹³ Harry Frankfurt, "Equality as a Moral Ideal," in The Importance of What we Care About (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988), pp. 143-58, and "Equality and Respect," in Necessity, Volition, and Love (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999), pp. 146-54.

¹⁴ Roger Crisp, "Equality, Priority, and Compassion," Ethics 113, 2003: 745-63.

kind,"¹⁵ and that justice is concerned with creating "conditions of life befitting human beings" that can be measured according to "absolute standards of fulfilment," not according to what others have. On this view, a universal conception of the goods "necessary for a good life" should be produced with reference to particular lists of basic goods.

These approaches are also open to serious objections. Thus Frankfurt's assertion that the pivotal issue is not how much others have but only whether I have "enough," is valid only when conditions of background justice pertain, that is only when others have not previously taken advantage of me. Hence we must look for reasons for such background justice elsewhere.

But, in addition, the idea of "having enough" or "getting enough" does not get at the essence of justice, i.e. the prevention of social domination. Justice is always a "relational" matter; it does not first inquire into subjective or objective states of affairs but into relations between human beings and what they owe to each other for what reasons. In particular, we do not explain the requirements of justice on the model of morally required aid in specific situations of want or need; instead they come into play in situations where what is at stake are relations between human beings that are fundamentally in need of justification, where those involved are connected by social relations of cooperation in the production and distribution of goods - or, as is mostly the case, by relations of "negative cooperation", of coercion or domination (whether by legal, economic or political means). It makes a huge difference whether someone is deprived of certain goods and opportunities unjustly and without justification or whether he or she, for whatever reason, lacks certain goods (for example, as a result of a natural catastrophe, as mentioned above). By losing sight of the former context, one misses or conceals the problem of justice as well as that of injustice. Justice requires that those involved in a context of (positive or negative) cooperation should be respected as equals. That means that they should enjoy equal rights to take part in the social and political order of justification in which the conditions under which goods are produced and distributed are determined.

The First Question of Justice

Let us review the essential points thus far from a constructive perspective. I have defined justice as the human capacity to oppose relations of arbitrary rule or domination. Domination is rule "without justification" and it is assumed that a just social order is one to which free and equal persons could give their assent – not just their counterfactual assent but assent based on institutionalised justification procedures. This is a recursive implication of the fact that what is at stake in political and social justice is norms of an institutional basic structure which claims reciprocal and universal validity. Thus a supreme principle holds within such a framework, namely the principle of general and reciprocal justification, which states that every claim to goods, rights or liberties must be justified in a reciprocal and general manner, where one side may not simply project its reasons onto the other but has to justify itself discursively.

¹⁵ Angelika Krebs, "Einleitung: Die neue Egalitarismuskritik im Überblick ", in Krebs (ed.), Gleichheit oder Gerechtigkeit (Frankfurt am Main: Suhrkamp, 2000), pp. 17f.

This brings us to the central insight for the problem of political and social justice, namely that the first question of justice is the question of power. For justice is not only a matter of which goods, for which reasons and in what amounts should legitimately be allocated to whom, but in particular of how these goods come into the world in the first place and of who decides on their allocation and how this allocation is made. Theories of a predominantly allocative-distributive kind are accordingly "oblivious to power" insofar as they conceive of justice exclusively from the "recipient side," and if necessary call for "redistributions," without emphasizing the political question of how the structures of production and allocation of goods are determined in the first place. The claim that the question of power is the first question of justice means that justice has its proper place where the central justifications for a social basic structure must be provided and the institutional ground rules are laid down which determine social life from the bottom up. Everything depends, if you will, on the relations of justification within a society. Power, understood as the effective "justificatory power" of individuals, is the higher-level good of justice.¹⁶ It is the "discursive" power to demand and provide justifications and to challenge false legitimations. This amounts to an argument for a "political turn" in the debate concerning justice and for a critical theory of justice as a critique of relations of justification.¹⁷

A comprehensive theory of political and social justice should be constructed on this basis, something at which I can only hint here.¹⁸ First we must make a conceptual distinction between fundamental (minimal) and full (maximal) justice. Whereas the task of fundamental justice is to construct a basic structure of justification, the task of full justice is to construct a justified basic structure. The former is necessary in order to pursue the latter, that is, a "putting-into-effect" of justification through constructive, discursive democratic procedures in which the "justificatory power" is distributed as evenly as possible among the citizens. In spite of the appearance of paradox, this means that fundamental justice is a substantive starting point of procedural justice. Based on a moral right to justification, arguments are presented for the basic structure in which those who are part of it have real opportunities to codetermine the institutions of this structure in a reciprocal and general manner. Fundamental justice guarantees all citizens an effective status "as equals ".

Transnational Contexts of Justice and Justification

Once the first dogma of recipient- and outcome-centred justice and the assumed incompatibility between justice and democracy which rests on that picture of justice has been surmounted, the path leading beyond the two other dogmas is already marked out. For it became clear that justice presupposes in the first instance specific practices of justification – within a basic structure of justification – and that this praxis is what we mean by democracy: those who are subject to norms should also be the authority which justifies these very norms – as active subjects of justification and not just in mente or in proxy or expert discourses.¹⁹ The goddess Justitia does not come into the world to dispense gifts; her task is instead to banish arbitrary rule, i.e. domination. Democracy is the best possible form of political order to accomplish this and to secure the political autonomy of those who are supposed to be both subjects and authors of the law – in accordance with their dignity as autonomous subjects of justification.²⁰

¹⁶ Power is a kind of good that cannot be distributed like a material good, as Iris Young argued in Justice and the Politics of Difference, ch. 1. But resources that help to generate power can be distributed, such as means of education and information and access to public communication; other such goods are social and political positions. I discuss the concept of power in my "Noumenal Power", Ms.

¹⁷ See Forst, Justification and Critique (Cambridge: Polity, forthcoming).

¹⁸ For a more detailed discussion see Forst, Contexts of Justice and The Right to Justification.

How should this result be interpreted in the transnational context? Let us first consider the position – the second false dogma – which asserts that only a state context can provide the preconditions for localising – i.e., grounding and realizing – justice. As I said, the proper place of justice is where a threat of arbitrary rule exists, where a context of cooperation could be or is degenerating into a context of domination. Thus, one might conclude, the existence of a certain context of social cooperation is an unavoidable precondition for a context of justice.

A number of theories have drawn this conclusion. In the first place, we must mention that of John Rawls. For his point of view – which leads him to locate social justice in the national sphere and to regard the international domain as one in which certain (minimal) human rights are valid and otherwise only duties of assistance²¹ – is not so much a state-centred as a cooperation-centred one. It is often underestimated how much weight Rawls attaches to the "most fundamental" idea of a "society as a fair system of social cooperation over time from one generation to the next," which he consistently situates at the centre of his theory.²² According to Rawls, only such a society provides the resources – in the twofold sense of material and normative resources – which are the presupposition for a "well-ordered society." Only here are the reciprocity conditions and the social cohesion – economic, political and moral – which a just society requires to be found.

Some theories develop this idea in a more communitarian direction, so that "common sentiments" or "shared understandings" within a nation become the essential presupposition for a context of justice;²³ others, by contrast, highlight the state as the central context. Thomas Nagel expresses this as follows: "Justice is something we owe through our shared institutions only to those with whom we stand in a strong political relation. It is, in the standard terminology, an associative obligation."²⁴ The essential aspects of such a "strong political relation" are the existence of a collectively authorised source of law and the non-voluntariness of the relation – that is, that the law expresses the will of the citizens (or at least claims to do so) and that this must

¹⁹ This marks a basic point of disagreement between Jürgen Neyer's view and mine. See Neyer, "Justice, not Democracy: Legitimacy in the European Union," and my "Justice and Democracy: Comments on Jürgen Neyer", both in: Rainer Forst and Rainer Schmalz-Bruns (eds), Political Legitimacy and Democracy in Transnational Perspective, RECON Report 13, Oslo: ARENA, 2011.

²⁰ See my "The Grounds of Critique. On the Concept of Human Dignity in Social Orders of Justification," tr. Ciaran Cronin, Philosophy and Social Criticism, forthcoming.

²¹ See John Rawls, The Law of Peoples (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1999).

²² John Rawls, Justice as Fairness: A Restatement, ed. Erin Kelly (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), p. 5. See also Rawls, A Theory of Justice, p. 9: "Fully to understand a conception of justice we must make explicit the conception of social cooperation from which it derives."

²³ David Miller, National Responsibility and Global Justice (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007), Michael Walzer, Spheres of Justice (New York: Basic Books, 1983).

²⁴ Thomas Nagel, "The Problem of Global Justice," Philosophy and Public Affairs 33, 2005: 113-47, here p. 121.

also be the case, normatively speaking, if citizens are not to be subjected to external constraints without adequate justification. Positive normative authority and factual coercion must coexist in order to form to a context of justice.

The arguments of Rawls and Nagel carry considerable weight because on a relational view a context of justice is in fact a particular context of social and political relations which gives rise to special demands. Nevertheless these approaches are problematic because they use a conclusion as a premise when they argue that a particular institutional context of social cooperation or a political community is a necessary precondition of the application of the concept of social or political justice. As explained above, Justitia is a man-made deity who comes into the world to banish social arbitrariness, and this means that she has her (combative) place were arbitrariness prevails among human beings or where it is a possibility. In such cases she calls for specific institutions, for example – traditionally speaking – for the rule of law where the "state of nature" existed; but then she cannot presuppose these institutions of justice. She presupposes the status of persons as beings who have a right to justification and she demands that a basic structure of justification be constructed where arbitrary rule has to be excluded; but she does not demand this only where a positive (i.e. legally constituted) institutional basic structure of positive (i.e. mutually beneficial) cooperation already exists. Thus we do not have to object to Rawls, as certain globalist cosmopolitans assume, that a "global basic structure" already in fact exists comparable to a national one,²⁵ since this is a competition that cosmopolitans can hardly win; nor do we need to object to Nagel that global governance institutions also exercise legal coercion and claim authority for this (though this is an important argument to make).²⁶ Instead we have to go beyond any dichotomous thinking in terms of "state" vs. "world" and accept the existence of a plurality of different contexts of social and structural justice (as contexts of political or social rule) or injustice (as contexts of domination) and thereby correctly situate or "ground" justice - informed by an appropriate and "realistic" social-scientific analysis of "what is."27

Such a "practice-dependent" approach to justice, to use Andrea Sangiovanni's apt phrase,²⁸ though in a different sense from his, would imply that a context of political or social justice exists wherever social (or legal or political) relations with a structure of cooperation in some minimally stable form exist. But this importantly includes, besides positive cooperation, negative cooperation, i.e. forms of unjustifiable coercion and of exploitation, in short, domination; and it is hard to dispute that such forms of social or political domination exist at the transnational level even in our "postcolonial" times.²⁹ Here a complex system of asymmetry and its reproduction

²⁵ See the original (and later differentiated) view of Charles Beitz in his Political Theory and International Relations (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1979), Pt. 3, and Thomas Pogge, Realizing Rawls (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1989), Ch. 6.

²⁶ See Joshua Cohen and Charles Sabel, "Extra Rempublicam Nulla Justitia?," Philosophy and Public Affairs 34, 2006: 147-75.

²⁷ Here I draw on my argument in "Towards a Critical Theory of Transnational Justice," in: Metaphilosophy 32, 2001: 160-79, reprinted in Thomas Pogge (ed.), Global Justice (Oxford: Blackwell, 2001), pp. 169-87.

²⁸ Andrea Sangiovanni, "Justice and the Priority of Politics to Morality," The Journal of Political Philosophy 16, 2008, pp. 137-64.

²⁹ See the accounts in Andrew Hurrell, On Global Order. Power, Values and the Constitution of International Society (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007), and Deborah D. Avant, Martha Finnemore, Susan K. Sell exists with numerous structures and relations in need of justification. This is why, reflexively speaking, the first task of justice would be to construct transnational structures of justification – structures which would have to be concrete enough to turn relations of domination into relations of justification and general enough to leave room for disputes and contestation concerning the analysis and evaluation of existing social relations and structures.³⁰ Justice tracks, as it were, arbitrariness and forms of domination and coercion wherever they occur. The assumption that this would first require an already existing positive, institutional social or legal context of cooperation fails to grasp the correct order of things: the first thing is injustice (i.e. asymmetrical social relations without justification) in the world and then justice calls for structures of justification and banishes human arbitrariness. Political and social justice is a relational as well as an institutional virtue; it does not refer to all relations between human beings, but to those which exhibit forms of positive rule or forms of domination – whether in the state or in the "state of nature," in the national or the international or the transnational domain in general.

With respect to "practice-dependence," we thus need to distinguish between positive and negative practice-dependence. The positive version refers to already established forms of rule and coercion by the state, or at least by legal institutions which claim normative authority and always harbour the danger that arbitrariness distorts given forms of cooperation. The negative version, by contrast, refers to forms of domination in need of justification and institutional "taming"; thus these practices are not sufficiently institutionalized. Positive practice-dependence comes in degrees, depending on the thickness of already institutionalized political and legal contexts, and so does domination, whether it be of an economic, a cultural or a political kind. But both practices mark contexts of justice.

Connected with the distinction between positive and negative practice-dependence is another important one which one-sided views of positive practice-dependence do not sufficiently pay tribute to, though it plays a role in their argument: there are institutions necessary to realize justice, depending on context, and there are practices and institutions which make justice necessary – in a way, they "call for" justice.³¹ Call these justice-realizing and justice-necessitating practices and institutions. It is a mistake to identify the two, for that would mean that we could not refer to injustice or the demand for justice outside of already established institutions. As the classic theorists of natural right argued, the injustice of the "state of nature" – i.e. the arbitrary rule of some over others in a pre-institutional form – or of the already established state – such as a monarchy according to Filmer's patriarchal view³² or the rule of the rich in Rousseau's Second Discourse³³ – both needed to be overcome by establishing a just and legitimate political order. The first task to be accomplished to ⁽eds), Who Governs the Globe? (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010).

³⁰ I am in agreement with Nancy Fraser, Scales of Justice. Reimagining Political Space in a Globalizing World (New York: Columbia University Press, 2009), esp. chs. 2 and 4, that the latter reflexive dimension is important; I think, however, that critical social analysis is capable of providing us with sufficient empirical knowledge about existing relations and structures without justification to locate substantive demands of fundamental justice.

³¹ See, for example, Sangiovanni, "Justice and the Priority of Politics to Morality," pp. 137 and 159.

³² As famously criticized in Locke's First Treatise of Government.

³³ Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Discourse on the Origin of Inequality, tr. F. Philip (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009).

that end must be to establish a sufficient order of justification such that those subjected by positive forms of rule or "wild" forms of domination are no longer just objects but also subjects, i.e. they become autonomous normative authorities. Following Kant and at the same time going beyond his idea of the only "innate" or "original" (angeboren) right of human beings,³⁴ the "ultimate" ground for this idea of justice-generating practices of justification is the basic human right to justification – i.e. the right which protects against being forced to live under institutions or being subjected to norms that cannot properly be justified towards those subjected as free and equal agents of justification. This is a reflexive right which calls for certain practices of justification in the sense of fundamental justice.

If it were possible to reconstruct the respective existing positive and negative contexts of rule, domination and coercion adequately, this would already go a long way towards answering the question concerning the contexts of justice. However, the complexity of Justitia would then become especially apparent because the corresponding basic structures of justification – from the state to the globe – would have to track these different contexts. This is why justice is still, in some sense, a goddess or a context-transcending idea, but one which does not do the work for us; we have to do it ourselves, as political and reflexive agents.

Demoi of subjection and justification

A critical theory of transnational justice does not paint an idealised image of perfect global distribution as an "end state" (Nozick), nor does it proceed from an "original position" involving all human beings. Instead it has a contextual starting point, for it traces the actually existing relations of positive rule and of domination and exploitation, of structural asymmetries and arbitrary rule, in order to call for the establishment of relations of justification, and hence of justifiability, wherever they are encountered. This opens up a complex panorama of relations, structures, actors and necessary institutions which appears highly confusing. The important point, however, is that justice tracks injustice, and hence the question "world state' or 'world of states'?" is not the primary concern from the perspective of justice. At some point we need to consider what form the structures of justification would have to assume in order to tame domination through transnational and international institutions, but before that kind of construction the first task is the "realistic" reconstruction of relations of domination.

As a consequence, the first constructive task of justice is to produce structures in which arbitrary rule is banished and fair relations of justification are realised – structures in which those who are exposed to rule or domination, whether of an economic, a political or a legal kind, can bring the "coercion towards the better argument" (to modify a formulation by Habermas) to bear against those who exercise such rule or domination. This is where democracy comes into play, to turn to the third dogma of political theory in this connection, which asserts that democracy calls for a demos organized within a state. Democracy, as I said above, is the term for a normative order in which those who are subject to binding legal norms should also be the normative authority that deliberates and decides about these norms, in an active sense in the context of a practice of justification. We are familiar with democratic normative orders within which different forms of such practices of justification exist, and we also know that they are riven by incessant conflicts over whether they can redeem their claim to justification. One need only think of issues like campaign financing, the 5% hurdle, plebiscites, and the like. Such sites and institutions also exist at the transnational and international levels, though they mostly remain at levels of development which, as in the case of the UN, reflect the post-war balance of power or simply global relations of economic power.

³⁴ Immanuel Kant, The Metaphysics of Morals, tr. M. Gregor (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), 6:237 (30).

If we understand democracy in such a way that it seeks to subsume the exercise of rule or domination under relations of effective justification and authorisation of norms by those who are subject to them, then the assumption that this requires a definite and single demos is problematic. For the demoi which are constituted as states are already integrated into such diverse networks of international and transnational rule or domination, formal and informal, that the "congruence condition" (Zürn)³⁵ of the authorisation and legitimate exercise of rule is no longer satisfied in a number of ways. There are demoi which, to simplify, are subjected to external power in different ways, and there are demoi which profit from such subjection - and there are hybrid forms of the two. But more than that, if we heed the principle of turning those subjected into agents with normative authority, it is questionable whether the existing demoi within state borders are generally the main or the only agents of justice and democracy.³⁶ Justice, and with it democracy, are recuperative institutions, not ones which found institutions ex nihilo; demoi constitute themselves through existing relations of rule or domination - which transcend state borders in more than one way constituting new social and political agents within and beyond existing polities.

In my view, processes of political recuperation already merit the title "democratic" when they succeed in creating effective relations of justification that curb domination, for instance through effective contestation,³⁷ even if they remain a step removed from complete recuperation and containment. A global constitutionalisation such as that proposed by Jürgen Habermas is not global democracy, much less deliberative democracy, in the guise of a world state.³⁸ But wherever the privileged are forced to renounce their prerogatives because, having been exposed, the ground has been pulled out from under them and justifiable counterpower is being mobilised – wherever this occurs and relations of justification are established which reclaim normative authority it marks an increase in democracy. The difference from attempts at democratization within societies such as ours can be large, but it seems to me to be a matter of degree, not of kind. Democracy progresses – often only in modest steps – where arbitrary and insufficiently justified rule, whether it be political, legal or

³⁵ Michael Zürn, Regieren jenseits des Nationalstaats (Frankfurt/Main: Suhrkamp, 1998), p. 17.

³⁶ Despite important agreements with the view of James Bohman, Democracy across Borders: From demos to demoi (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 2007), we differ over how far the notion of demoi needs to be redefined according to existing relations of domination that transcend existing polities. In his federalist view, these remain the essential political agents forming higher-order political entities such as the EU.

³⁷ See Philip Pettit, "Democracy, National and International", The Monist 89, 2006: 301-24. I do not follow Pettit's sharp distinction between an "authorial" and an "editorial" notion of democratic control; in order to be democratic, a basic structure of justification has to contain both elements, combined within practices of justification. Only in that way can domination be structurally avoided.

³⁸ Jürgen Habermas, "Does the Cosmopolitanization of International Law Still Have a Chance?", in The Divided West (Cambridge: Polity, 2006), pp. 115-93.

economic, is exposed and ultimately subjected to the justificatory authority of those affected. This is a question of justice – the question of justice.

Such practices of justice are no more confined to the long-established institutions and political ways of thinking than are the relations of domination to which persons all over the world are exposed. In political theory, we have to think of justice and democracy in terms of processes of recuperation and of the increase of relations of justification, not in terms of fixed and narrow ideals. For democracy and justice are ultimately autonomous practices which create their own forms.

Two Pictures of Europe

The essential lesson that follows from this for thinking about democracy and justice within the European Union is that we should be sceptical of free-standing conceptions of its telos or finalité. Realistically speaking, the EU has grown into a powerful supranational, international and transnational polity sui generis, which means that the question of its legitimacy needs to be answered in a reflexive and democratic way,³⁹ but such that the main focus is on the power-relations within and beyond this entity.⁴⁰ The famous "legitimation question" is the question of which structures of justification need to be established in order to recuperate - i.e. tame and legitimise - the exercise and effects of power, rule and domination which exist on the various regional, national and transnational levels. Within the legal realm of the EU, this is already a Herculean task, but it is even more so with respect to the equally important dimension of the relations between the EU and states, institutions and persons outside its jurisdiction which form various demoi of subjection. How it deals with migrants, neighbouring states and the many regions of the world it affects (and sometimes dominates) through its policies, be they agricultural or ecological, for example, will also determine whether it can claim to be a just polity.

If we think back to the two pictures of justice with which I began, an alternative opens up for the EU as a political project. For it is quite possible that it will not develop in the direction called for by the second, apt picture of justice, but that it will become a model for a transnational polity according to the first picture. This would mean that democratic justice would be sacrificed for certain levels of the provision of goods and that such output, even if unequally distributed, would be seen as providing it with legitimacy. That would go along with an increase in the standard of living for many as well as further elitist and technocratic forms of rule, not to mention internal and external domination. Thus it would represent a diminution of politics on a large scale – especially so if the citizens of Europe did not even regard these pictures as a basic alternative.

³⁹ As emphasized by Erik O. Eriksen, The Unfinished Democratization of Europe (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009); Bohman, Democracy across Borders, Ch. 4, and Rainer Schmalz-Bruns, "Democratic Legitimacy, Political Normativity and Statehood," in Erik O. Eriksen and John Erik Fossum (eds), What Democracy for Europe?, RECON Report 11, Oslo: ARENA, 2010, pp. 83-114.

⁴⁰ See James Tully, "A New Kind of Europe? Democratic Integration in the European Union," in Public Philosophy in a New Key (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2008), pp. 225-42.

RECON Online Working Papers

2011/12 Rainer Forst Transnational Justice and Democracy

2011/11

Petra Guasti The Europeanisation of Parliaments in Central and Eastern Europe

2011/10

Espen D. H. Olsen European Citizenship With a Nation-State, Federal, or Cosmopolitan Twist?

2011/09

Hauke Brunkhorst Cosmopolitanism and Democratic Freedom

2011/08 Eric Miklin and Ben Crum Inter-Parliamentary Contacts of Members of the European Parliament Report of a Survey

2011/07

John Erik Fossum Nationalism, Patriotism and Diversity Conceptualising the National Dimension in Neil MacCormick's Post-Sovereign Constellation

2011/06

Agustín José Menéndez United they Diverge? From Conflict of Laws to Constitutional Theory? On Christian Joerges' Theory

2011/05 Olga Brzezińska, Beata Czajkowska and David Skully Re-constructing Polish Identity Searching for a New Language

2011/04 Mihály Csákó Education for Democracy in Hungarian Schools

2011/03

Christopher Lord and Dionysia Tamvaki The Politics of Justification? Applying the 'Discourse Quality Index' to the Study of the European Union

2011/02

Agustín José Menéndez From Constitutional Pluralism to a Pluralistic Constitution? Constitutional Synthesis as a MacCormickian Constitutional Theory of European Integration

2011/01

Radostina Primova Enhancing the Democratic Legitimacy of EU Governance? The Impact of Online Public Consultations in Energy Policy-making

2010/29

Maria Weimer Policy Choice versus Science in Regulating Animal Cloning Under the WTO Law

2010/28

Stefan Collignon Fiscal Policy Rules and the Sustainability of Public Debt in Europe

2010/27

Cathrine Holst Martha Nussbaum's Outcome-oriented Theory of Justice Philosophical Comments

2010/26

Waltraud Schelkle, Joan Costa-i-Font and Christa van Wijnbergen Consumer Choice, Welfare Reform and Participation in Europe A Framework for Analysis

2010/25

John Erik Fossum and Agustín José Menéndez The Theory of Constitutional Synthesis A Constitutional Theory for a Democratic European Union

2010/24 Raúl Letelier Non-Contractual Liability for Breaches of EU Law The Tension Between Corrective and Distributive Justice?

2010/23 Sara Clavero and Yvonne Galligan Gender Equality in the European Union Lessons for Democracy?

2010/22

Pieter de Wilde, Hans-Jörg Trenz and Asimina Michailidou Contesting EU Legitimacy The Prominence, Content and Justification of Euroscepticism During 2009 EP Election Campaigns

2010/21

Rainer Nickel

Data Mining and 'Renegade' Aircrafts The States as Agents of a Global Militant Security Governance Network – The German Example

2010/20

David G. Mayes and Zaidah Mustaffa Social Models in the Enlarged EU

2010/19

Tess Altman and Chris Shore Social Welfare and Democracy in Europe What Role for the Private and Voluntary Sectors?

2010/18

Aleksandra Maatsch Between an Intergovernmental and a Polycentric European Union National Parliamentary Discourses on Democracy in the EU Ratification Process

2010/17

Erik O. Eriksen and John Erik Fossum Bringing European Democracy back in Or how to Read the German Constitutional Court's Lisbon Treaty Ruling?

2010/16 Jean L. Cohen Constitutionalism Beyond the State Myth or Necessity?

2010/15 Rainer Forst Two Stories about Toleration

2010/14 Zdenka Mansfeldová and Petra Rakušanová Guasti The Quality of Democracy in the Czech Republic

2010/13 Emmanuel Sigalas, Monika Mokre, Johannes Pollak, Peter Slominski and Jozef Bátora Democracy Models and Parties at the EU Level Empirical Evidence from the Adoption of the 2009 European Election Manifestoes

2010/12

Antje Wiener and Uwe Puetter Informal Elite Dialogue and Democratic Control in EU Foreign and Security Policy

2010/11 Erik Oddvar Eriksen European Transformation A Pragmatist Approach

2010/10 Justus Schönlau The Committee of the Regions The RECON Models from a Subnational Perspective

2010/09

Asimina Michailidou and Hans-Jörg Trenz 2009 European Parliamentary Elections on the Web A Mediatization Perspective

2010/08

Kolja Möller European Governmentality or Decentralised Network Governance? The Case of the European Employment Strategy

2010/07 Kjartan Koch Mikalsen In Defence of Kant's League of States

2010/06 Nora Schleicher Gender Identity in a Democratic Europe 2010/05 Christian Joerges The Idea of a Three-Dimensional Conflicts Law as Constitutional Form

2010/04

Meltem Müftüler-Baç and Nora Fisher Onar Women's Rights in Turkey as Gauge of its European Vocation The Impact of 'EU-niversal Values'

2010/03

Neil Walker Constitutionalism and Pluralism in Global Context

2010/02

Dominika Biegoń European Identity Constructions in Public Debates on Wars and Military Interventions

2010/01

Federica Bicchi and Caterina Carta The COREU/CORTESY Network and the Circulation of Information within EU Foreign Policy

2009/19

Rachel Herp Tausendfreund The Commission and its Principals Delegation Theory on a Common European External Trade Policy in the WTO

2009/18 Marianne Riddervold Making a Common Foreign Policy EU Coordination in the ILO

2009/17 Uwe Puetter and Antje Wiener EU Foreign Policy Elites and Fundamental Norms Implications for Governance

2009/16

Emmanuel Sigalas, Monika Mokre, Johannes Pollak, Jozef Bátora and Peter Slominski Reconstituting Political Representation in the EU The Analytical Framework and the Operationalisation of the RECON Models

2009/15

Meltem Müftüler-Baç and Yaprak Gürsoy Is There an Europeanisation of Turkish Foreign Policy? An Addendum to the Literature on EU Candidates

2009/14

Maria Weimer Applying Precaution in Community Authorisation of Genetically Modified Products Challenges and Suggestions for Reform

2009/13

Dionysia Tamvaki Using Eurobarometer Data on Voter Participation in the 2004 European Elections to Test the RECON Models

2009/12 Arndt Wonka and Berthold Rittberger How Independent are EU Agencies?

2009/11

Tanja Hitzel-Cassagnes and Rainer Schmalz-Bruns Recognition and Political Theory:

Paradoxes and Conceptual Challenges of the Politics of Recognition

2009/10

Hans-Jörg Trenz and Pieter de Wilde Denouncing European Integration Euroscepticism as Reactive Identity Formation

2009/09 Pieter de Wilde Designing Politicization How Control Mechanisms in National Parliaments Affect Parliamentary Debates in EU Policy-Formulation

2009/08 Erik Oddvar Eriksen Explicating Social Action Arguing or Bargaining?

2009/07 Hans-Jörg Trenz, Nadine Bernhard and Erik Jentges Civil Society and EU Constitution-Making Towards a European Social Constituency? 2009/06 Kjartan Koch Mikalsen Regional Federalisation with a Cosmopolitan Intent

2009/05

Agustín José Menéndez European Citizenship after Martínez Sala and Bambaust Has European Law Become More Human but Less Social?

2009/04

Giandomenico Majone The 'Referendum Threat', the Rationally Ignorant Voter, and the Political Culture of the EU

2009/03

Johannes Pollak, Jozef Bátora, Monika Mokre, Emmanuel Sigalas and Peter Slominski On Political Representation Myths and Challenges

2009/02

Hans-Jörg Trenz In Search of Popular Subjectness Identity Formation, Constitution-Making and the Democratic Consolidation of the EU

2009/01

Pieter de Wilde Reasserting the Nation State The Trajectory of Euroscepticism in the Netherlands 1992-2005

2008/20

Anne Elizabeth Stie Decision-Making Void of Democratic Qualities? An Evaluation of the EU's Foreign and Security Policy

2008/19

Cathleen Kantner, Amelie Kutter and Swantje Renfordt The Perception of the EU as an Emerging Security Actor in Media Debates on Humanitarian and Military Interventions (1990-2006) 2008/18 Cathrine Holst Gender Justice in the European Union The Normative Subtext of Methodological choices

2008/17

Yaprak Gürsoy and Meltem Müftüler-Baç The European Union's Enlargement Process and the Collective Identity Formation in Turkey The Interplay of Multiple Identities

2008/16

Yvonne Galligan and Sara Clavero Assessing Gender Democracy in the European Union A Methodological Framework

2008/15

Agustín José Menéndez Reconstituting Democratic Taxation in Europe The Conceptual Framework

2008/14

Zdzisław Mach and Grzegorz Pożarlik Collective Identity Formation in the Process of EU Enlargement Defeating the Inclusive Paradigm of a European Democracy?

2008/13

Pieter de Wilde Media Coverage and National Parliaments in EU Policy-Formulation Debates on the EU Budget in the Netherlands 1992-2005

2008/12

Daniel Gaus Legitimate Political Rule Without a State? An Analysis of Joseph H. H. Weiler's Justification of the Legitimacy of the European Union Qua Non-Statehood

2008/11

Christopher Lord Some Indicators of the Democratic Performance of the European Union and How They Might Relate to the RECON Models 2008/10 Nicole Deitelhof Deliberating ESDP European Foreign Policy and the International Criminal Court

2008/09 Marianne Riddervold Interests or Principles? EU Foreign Policy in the ILO

2008/08 Ben Crum The EU Constitutional Process A Failure of Political Representation?

2008/07

Hans-Jörg Trenz In Search of the European Public Sphere Between Normative Overstretch and Empirical Disenchantment

2008/06

Christian Joerges and Florian Rödl On the "Social Deficit" of the European Integration Project and its Perpetuation Through the ECJ Judgements in Viking and Laval

2008/05

Yvonne Galligan and Sara Clavero Reserching Gender Democracy in the European Union Challenges and Prospects

2008/04

Thomas Risse and Jana Katharina Grabowsky European Identity Formation in the Public Sphere and in Foreign Policy

2008/03 Jens Steffek Public Accountability and the Public Sphere of International Governance

2008/02 Christoph Haug Public Spheres within Movements Challenging the (Re)search for a European Public Sphere 2008/01 James Caporaso and Sidney Tarrow Polanyi in Brussels European Institutions and the Embedding of Markets in Society

2007/19 Helene Sjursen Integration Without Democracy? Three Conceptions of European Security Policy in Transformation

2007/18 Anne Elizabeth Stie Assessing Democratic Legitimacy From a Deliberative Perspective An Analytical Framework for Evaluating the EU's Second Pillar Decision-Making System

2007/17

Swantje Renfordt Do Europeans Speak With One Another in Time of War? Results of a Media Analysis on the 2003 Iraq War

2007/16 Erik Oddvar Eriksen and John Erik Fossum A Done Deal? The EU's Legitimacy Conundrum Revisited

2007/15 Helene Sjursen Enlargement in Perspective The EU's Quest for Identity

2007/14 Stefan Collignon Theoretical Models of Fiscal Policies in the Euroland The Lisbon Strategy, Macroeconomic Stability and the Dilemma of Governance with Governments

2007/13 Agustín José Menéndez The European Democratic Challenge

2007/12 Hans-Jörg Trenz Measuring Europeanisation of Public Communication The Question of Standards 2007/11 Hans-Jörg Trenz, Maximilian Conrad and Guri Rosén The Interpretative Moment of European Journalism The Impact of Newspaper Opinion Making in the Ratification Process

2007/10

Wolfgang Wagner The Democratic Deficit in the EU's Security and Defense Policy – Why Bother?

2007/09 Helene Sjursen 'Doing Good' in the World? Reconsidering the Basis of the Research Agenda on the EU's Foreign and Security Policy

2007/08

Dawid Friedrich Old Wine in New Bottles? The Actual and Potential Contribution of Civil Society Organisations to Democratic Governance in Europe

2007/07

Thorsten Hüller Adversary or 'Depoliticized' Institution? Democratizing the Constitutional Convention

2007/06

Christoph Meyer The Constitutional Treaty Debates as Revelatory Mechanisms Insights for Public Sphere Research and Re-Launch Attempts

2007/05 Neil Walker Taking Constitutionalism Beyond the State

2007/04 John Erik Fossum Constitutional Patriotism Canada and the European Union

2007/03 Christian Joerges Conflict of Laws as Constitutional Form Reflections on International Trade Law and the Biotech Panel Report

2007/02

James Bohman Democratizing the Transnational Polity The European Union and the Presuppositions of Democracy

2007/01

Erik O. Eriksen and John Erik Fossum Europe in Transformation How to Reconstitute Democracy

Reconstituting Democracy in Europe (RECON)

RECON seeks to clarify whether democracy is possible under conditions of complexity, pluralism and multilevel governance. Three models for reconstituting democracy in Europe are delineated and assessed: (i) reframing the EU as a functional regime and reconstituting democracy at the national level; (ii) establishing the EU as a multi-national federal state; or (iii) developing a post-national Union with an explicit cosmopolitan imprint.

RECON is an Integrated Project financed by the European Commission's Sixth Framework Programme for Research, Priority 7 – Citizens and Governance in a Knowledge-based Society. Project No.: CIT4-CT-2006-028698.

Coordinator: ARENA - Centre for European Studies, University of Oslo.

Project website: www.reconproject.eu

RECON Online Working Paper Series

The Working Paper Series publishes work from all the researchers involved in the RECON project, but it is also open to submissions from other researchers working within the fields covered by RECON. The topics of the series correspond to the research focus of RECON's work packages. RECON Online Working Papers are widely circulated and included in online social science databases. Contact: admin@reconproject.eu.

Editors

Euitors
Erik O. Eriksen, ARENA – University of Oslo	John Erik Fossum, ARENA – University of Oslo
Editorial Board
Ben Crum, Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam	Zdzislaw Mach, Jagiellonian University Krakow
Yvonne Galligan, Queen's University Belfast	Agustín José Menéndez, University of León
Christian Joerges, University of Bremen	Helene Sjursen, ARENA – University of Oslo
Ulrike Liebert, University of Bremen	Hans-Jörg Trenz, ARENA – University of Oslo
Christopher Lord, ARENA – University of Oslo	Wolfgang Wagner, Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam